over, a . . . goodness, I don't know really, dear. Anyhow, it's expensive, and let's just forget about it, shall we?"

It was obvious to Jo that the subject was closed, and she finished her dessert in silence.

However, in her dreams that night, Jo saw herself at the Prom, drifting by in Bill's arms . . . all the other couples staring with envy at her red taffeta gown, and the filmy black lace stole that lightly touched her shoulders as she danced. It was a lovely dream, but still she tossed in her sleep.

Every day after school closed, Jo somehow found herself standing in front of the display window at Jackson's, spending long minutes gazing fondly at the stole she would never have. In fact, her days were spent dreaming about it, and she hardly realized one day that her 17th birthday had arrived. But the gayly wrapped packages that greeted her at dinner that night served as a wonderful reminder. Lynn had been invited to the birthday dinner, as she had been every year since the girls had become friends, and was as eager to have the presents unwrapped as Jo was. Jo read the card that accompanied the first package. It read, "To my very best friend, with love, Lynn."

The ribbon was anxiously untied and the paper ripped off, and as Jo opened the package, she sighed rapturously. It was the black lace stole, and Jo could hardly control her emotions. "Oh Lynn," she cried, "You shouldn't have . . . it must have taken you a year's allowance!"

As Lynn prepared to modestly say, "Well, not quite that much," she noticed that Mr. Wheeler, Mrs. Wheeler, and Jo's Aunt Mary, who was also present, gasped in amazement.

Mr. Wheeler broke the silence that followed. "Er, ah, Jo . . . I guss you'd better open my package next . . . it's the one with the blue ribbon!"

Mrs. Wheeler, too, looked strange. "And mine, next, dear."

Aunt Mary was stunned. "Then the one wrapped in red paper!"

Jo looked up at those seated about her. They all looked uncomfortable, and she soon knew why. She caught her breath as she opened her dad's present, Aunt Mary's, her mother's, and the one that Lynn's mother had sent over that afternoon, for all the packages revealed black lace stoles, and all the boxes were from Jackson's Department Store. Jo was now the owner of not one, but FIVE stoles.

"Gee whiz!" sighed Lynn.

"Oh, my . . ." whispered Aunt Mary to Mrs. Wheeler.

"Well, of all the . . ." sputtered a very confused Mr. Wheeler.

"Well . . . er . . . ah, isn't this . . . NICE," Jo managed to say, her eyes wide with wonder.

After another silence, Aunt Mary suggested that Joe call Jackson's in the morning and ask them if they could exchange four of the stoles for some other things she might like to have. But the next morning, when Jo hung up the telephone, she said to her mother, "Gosh, this is terrible. The adjustment clerk said that Jackson's doesn't make any exchanges on scarves and stoles. What am I going to do with FIVE of them?"

By the time the night of the Prom had arrived, Jo had made her decision. And when, escorted by Bill, she went into the school gym to join her friends in the festive spirit of this occasion, she had on the red taffeta dress, and over her shoulders was one of the beautiful stoles she had received as a gift. Another one was in her mother's bureau drawer, for she had given it to Mrs. Wheeler, who knew that she would never wear the lovely thing . . . a third one was at Aunt Mary's house, now cut up into two exquisite cocktail aprons, the fourth lay in its original box, untouched, on Lynn's mother's dressing table, and the fifth was seen drifting into the gym, over Lynn's shoulders.

Jo approached her best friend, and said with a smile, "My dear, that IS a lovely thing about your shoulders. Where on earth did you ever find such an EXCLUSIVE design!"

And the two friends hugged each other, and rocked with laughter!
